Section Summary: A past narrative can include past perfect for earlier experience. Match supplied vocabulary to context, and obey sentence-count and opening-word instructions.

Section C — Reading programme

10. Using two readers, show that women's responsibilities extend beyond kitchen work, giving three points from each.

Step 1: Choose Hawa and Mauja from the two prescribed readers and organise three distinct contributions for each.

Step 2: Use Hawa's driving, removal of the drunken passenger and help for the injured boy; use Mauja's mat weaving, farm work and advice. Explain each contribution.

Step 3: Relate every example to the claim about women's wider roles. End with a conclusion about opportunity and recognition.

Final Answer: Model response:

Women contribute to economic and social life as well as to their households. Hawa the Bus Driver and Mabala the Farmer, both by R. S. Mabala, illustrate this through Hawa and Mauja.

First, Hawa earns her living as a bus driver. She transports passengers in a demanding occupation and demonstrates that women can perform skilled public work. Second, she protects passengers by removing a drunken man who causes trouble on her bus. This shows courage and the ability to maintain order, responsibilities extending beyond household duties. Third, when a boy is knocked down by a vehicle, Hawa takes him to hospital. Her practical response makes her a contributor to community welfare rather than someone concerned only with her own home.

In Mabala the Farmer, Mauja supports the family economically by weaving mats. Selling what she makes provides income and shows productive skill. She also works on the farm: she digs, plants and weeds while Mabala struggles with the demands of farming. Her labour helps produce food and demonstrates an important agricultural role. Finally, she advises Mabala and other villagers, sharing practical knowledge. Guiding her husband towards responsible work shows that she contributes ideas and judgement as well as labour.

The six examples challenge the belief that women belong only in kitchens. Hawa and Mauja earn, protect, care, produce and guide. Their communities benefit when these contributions are recognised and women have opportunities to develop their abilities.

Study Tip: This is a model literary argument. Use accurate episodes from the reader studied; other prescribed female characters can also support the statement.

Section Summary: Organise literary essays around the exact claim. Give distinct contributions for each character and explain their importance.
